Curtain Call for CANDY

"AW come on, sugarfoot," wailed Ted, as he pleaded with Candy. "You're not really going to kill all our date time rehearsing for that floppo show, are ya?" Candy tossed her head defiantly. "I don't like your use of the term 'floppo,' Ted Dawson. Yes, I'm going to rehearse. It's an honor to be selected for a bit part by Bart Robbins. He's a rising star." "Rising star!" exclaimed Ted. "You mean falling fragment, don't you? That guy couldn't hoist the sand bags in a grade Z production."

At this point Candy whirled on her heel and slammed through the door of the Hartwick Theatre leaving a disgusted Ted behind her. Inside was the hustle and bustle of rehearsal. The Hartwick Commerce Club had engaged Robbins' Travelling Theatrical Company to help its charity drive by putting on a show using local talent in the smaller parts. Candy was lodged in a dressing room with her friend Tina and the blonde Cornelia Clyde, Candy's arch rival.

"Well," greeted Cornelia in snide fashion, "if it isn't little Miss Glamour herself. All set to wow the star again today, dear? If you had walked any closer to Bart Robbins in that waitress scene yesterday you'd have crowded him into the violin section." Tina paused in applying her makeup to observe. Candy merely elevated her chin and turned to her costume, making no reply. "Oh, the silent treatment, eh," added Cornelia. "You ought to give it a try, Corny," interjected Tina. "It would be a relief to all of us." Cornelia left the room shortly thereafter.

Candy thanked Tina for coming to her defense. "It's okay, Candy," replied Tina, "but gee, I'd think twice before I got a yen for that Robbins duck. Every girl in the show is angling for him to take her to the party opening night." "I know," sighed Candy, "but it sure would be exciting to date him . . . his penetrating gaze, broad shoulders and that beautiful dark hair. He's terrific, Tina." "Yeah," replied Tina, yawning.

In the meantime, Cornelia Clyde had set her sights on Bart Robbins and approached him accordingly as he added touches to his makeup for rehearsal. "Mr. Robbins, I suppose you'd be interested in having your show appear at as many towns as possible?" Robbins brightened immediately. "Why yes, Miss . . . er . . ." "Cornelia," supplied the shy Miss Clyde. Robbins blanched openly at this one but still looked interested. Cornelia talked glibly and finally stated quite definitely that if Bart Robbins would escort her to the opening night party, she would use her influence with her uncle who was President of the Berthold City Commerce Club.

"Well, that's as forward a bargain as I've been offered, Miss Cly . . . er Cornelia, but it's a deal. I hope you won't be disappointed," said Bart, gallantly. Cornelia left victoriously, smiling her usual smug smile. She met Candy and Tina as she came from Robbins' dressing room and could not resist a final plunge. "You'd better recruit old dependable Dawson for the party, Candy, because Bart Robbins is taking me."

Candy drooped visibly. "Don't let it get you, Candy," Tina sympathized. "He's just a load of grease paint and shoulder pads, besides you've only seen him at rehearsals. You couldn't be serious about him in such a short time. And Ted is a peach of a guy." "Oh, sure, Tina, Ted's fine, but Bart Robbins is my ideal. I've just got to think of a way to outwit that dimwit, Corny." Candy started perking. "I've got it," she shrieked, just as Bart emerged from his dressing room. "Mr. Robbins," she began, "I'd like to invite the cast to my house for the opening night party." He looked impressed. "Splendid! These shindigs were costing me too much . . . ulp, I mean it will be a pleasant change from the usual festivities at a hotel or restaurant. Miss . . . er . . ." "O'Connor," supplied Candy happily.

Ted went along with the plans reluctantly. He had heard of Candy's crush on the actor and took a dim view of his second team position. Opening night was a huge success and all were gathered at the O'Connor home for the party anxiously awaiting the arrival of Bart Robbins and his date. Cornelia surprised everyone by coming first. "Stood you up, eh Corny?" queried Tina. "Bart will be here shortly," replied Cornelia snootily. "He's discussing plans for his next production with my uncle. He called and said he'd meet me here." "So that's how you snared him, by dangling your uncle's Commerce Club as bait," piped Candy. Cornelia turned on her furiously. "And you needn't think you'll get him away by having the party at your house."

"Cut the comments, gals," said Ted. "This must be your dream man now," and he headed for the door as the bell rang. He came back into the room looking stunned. Following him were two men, both bald, both slight in build and wearing glasses. Silence fell on the room. Cornelia shattered it by stammering, "Unc . . . uncle!" Ted laughed. "Which one's your uncle, Cornie?"

Both men laughed and the bald bespectacled Bart Robbins came over to the wavering Cornelia. Candy and Ted stood nearby. "Don't look so shattered, Cornelia. Makeup does wonders for actors you know," said the obviously amused Robbins. Ted looked at Candy who had started to snicker. "And I wonder if we could make up, Candy, now that the acting is over."
